I miss your super writings. Past few posts are just a little out of track! come on!As is well known, the immediate availability of a system that automatically removes caked or contaminated floor surfaces and delivers the removed dirt and contaminants to a suitable receptacle is extremely desirable for a wide variety of applications. For example, in laundries and commercial food service establishments, the cleanliness of the floors in the kitchen, dining room and serving areas of the establishment is of prime importance, as well as the cleanliness of the floor surfaces in the kitchen wash room. Accordingly, it is highly desirable to remove any dirt or contaminants from the floor surfaces as soon as the spilled or tracked-in dirt or dust is deposited thereon. Particularly in foodservice establishments, any spillage or run-off of dirt, dust, food or other materials that can be subsequently tracked into the establishment is undesirable since it may cause contamination of food or materials within the establishment. The conventional practice of manually cleaning the floor surfaces in a foodservice establishment is not only extremely cumbersome and time-consuming, but is also highly inefficient. Further, the presence of an additional person in a restaurant or other food service establishment may not only become an inconvenience, but may be considered to constitute a fire hazard. Accordingly, the provision of an automatic cleaning system that can remove caked or contaminated floor surfaces and deliver the removed dirt and contaminants to a suitable receptacle without the need for a human attendant would be highly desirable. Floor cleaning systems of various types have been proposed over the years. U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,679,173; 4,698,674; 4,702,169; 4,932,617; 5,329,989; 5,547,030; 6,032,664; 6,215,929; and 6,232,838 are exemplary of such prior art floor cleaning systems. However, all such prior art floor cleaning systems are relatively complicated and thus are relatively expensive to manufacture and install. Therefore, there is a continuing need for an improved floor cleaning system which is relatively simple in construction, yet easy to operate and service, and which is capable of automatically cleaning caked
